THE MIRACLE AT THE POOL BETHESDA.

ST. JOHN, 5TH CHAP.

Hard by Bethesda's fountain clear,
The thronging sick folk stood,
Waiting the Angel's visit there,
To bless the troubled flood.

Among the crowd who sought to lave,
One leprous beggar lay,
Seeking in vain to reach the wave,
And wash his sores away.

No helping hand in kindness brought,
The wretched Lamer near,
Far from the pool in grief he sought
The solace of despair.

It chanced that Jesus passing by
The nameless mourner heard;
And breathing over him mercy's sigh
Pronounced the healing word—

"Be whole! Arise. In peace depart,
That sovereign grace adore,
Whose guardian care and love impart
Thy health and strength once more."

Thus in the guilt of nature lies
Each earth-born child of woe,
In vain he strives and aims to rise,
From sin and death below.

For him alas! there is no place
To bath in mercy's stream,
Till Jesus' word and Jesus' grace
The Lamer's soul redeem.

Then Saviour send from Zion's mount
Thy health imparting love;
And fit the soul for that sweet fount,
Around thy throne above. ASAPH.

OBITUARY.

The memory of the Righteous Dead belongs to the living. Valuable is the bequest. Thoughtful minds will improve its wholesome instruction. However familiar to mankind may be the evidences of mortality, or reluctant, with individuals, the acknowledgment of their uncertain state of being, it is not less an act of justice than of wisdom to moralize on the melancholy proofs. Another opportunity, of the kind, occurs in the death of Mr. JAMES PATTON. Inspired with the honorable ambition to improve his worldly condition, and if success should crown his enterprise, to act as the pioneer of his Father's family in their removal to this country, he emigrated from his native home, County Armagh, Ireland. After a very perilous voyage, early last spring, he arrived in New York, and from thence, almost immediately, removed to Camden. Although a comparative stranger Mr. PATTON, by diligent attention to business and gentlemanly conduct, was enabled to win the confidence of the Mercantile House in which he was employed, and to obtain the respect of the community at large. Educated under the strict care of pious parents, and the particular interest of a faithful pastor, the interesting object of their superintention seemed to have been trained from early infancy in the way of holiness. On arrival in Camden, he professed himself a member of the Episcopal Church, participated in its communion, and took part in the teaching of its Sunday School. From such evidences of pious character, and disposition to be useful, the hope was cherished that his life would be spared for the ornament of the church, the good of society, and the blessing of his friends. The wisdom of Providence had better things in store. He was attacked with Bilious Fever, which unexpectedly assuming the Congestive form terminated his earthly probation on the 11th Sept. last, after a few days illness, and in the 21st year of his age. Bereaved relatives will be comforted with the information this notice is intended to convey, that the efforts of medical skill, and the kindest attentions of friends were afforded to alleviate his disease, and render his last moments peaceful. In conversation with his friend, the Rector of the Parish, the patient sufferer expressed himself resigned to the divine will; and his mind appeared to be filled with christian hopes. Firm was his trust in the Saviour's mercy. With the reasonable confidence of a resurrection unto life, in scriptural language, "he fell asleep," justifying the belief that his was the death of the Righteous. Thus suddenly cut down in the bloom of health, in the vigor of early manhood, and in the hope of protracted usefulness, the mortal ceased to be. It was meet that his dust should return to the earth as it was. The memory of ripening virtues shed a sweet fragrance over his grave.

He is gone to his rest, in the Long Home expected
By pilgrims who mourn over life's weary gloom;
And bright as the beams from his glory reflected
Are eternity's hopes that light up his tomb.

From the hearth of his childhood, midst peril and danger,
The wanderer sought o'er the Ocean's dark wave
A new home, and new friends to welcome the stranger,
To soothe his last moments, and weep o'er his grave.

Nor hopeless despond they, when telling the story
Of the lord one who sleeps beneath the dark sod
They will think of his worth, and remember the glory
That remains at the last for the people of God.

Calm! calm! be thy rest as the twilight descending
Its requiem sighs o'er thy still honor'd dust,
Till the wing of an Angel in glory ascending,
Shall waft it on high to the home of the Just.

A FRIEND

It is the melancholy duty of friendship to announce the death of Mrs. CATHARINE A. BERRIN, aged 50 years. Born to opulence, and educated for the refinement of society in Virginia, her connections are among the most respectable families of that State. As a resident for several years, of this community, the amiable traits of her character were shown in the social and domestic relations. Frequent indeed, were the changes of her residence and circumstances. But under them all she had learned the wisdom to be reconciled to the leadings of providence, and to do her duty in that state of life into which it pleased God to call her. Ever anxious to do good, kind and affectionate in manner, prudent, and careful of the varied interests within her circle of influence, her whole life time was the evidence of a devoted wife, sincere friend, and exemplary woman. Her death occasioned by the prevailing bilious fever, on 11th ult. From expressions which she used during illness of resignation to the orderings of divine will, fervent hope of salvation through the Redeemer, and the tranquillity of her mind at the prospect of death, there is reason for the belief, that she had made the happy exchange of mortality, for the inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that which fadeth not away.

Let me bespeak of the reader a moment's recurrence to the 11th of September, ult. On the morning of that day, our little society were called upon to lament a melancholy bereavement in the death of Doctor ALBION BERRIN.

The writer of this hasty line, in asking the privilege of thus simply recording the decease of that truly good man, affects not a tribute here to be deemed worthy of his memory. But though the voice of eulogy cannot reach his ear, yet to his neighbors and associates, the tomb of Berrin speaks a powerful and impressive lesson of admonition and improvement. It is in that the living should thus learn from the example of the meritorious dead. By the life and character of our deceased fellow citizen, are we taught, to be good, and retiring; enlightened, yet unpretending; independent in sentiment, yet bland in manner; generously charitable, not in purse only, but in opinion also, and perfectly unobtrusive to all mankind. It is not known, that the deceased ever used an expression which would diminish the value of a human being, and I believe I may say in the terms of strict truth that he has left not an enemy behind him. Of whom among the living, in the like event, shall the same be truly said? Who may boast those amiable characteristics which warm profound and universal respect into ardent affection?

Doctor BERRIN was one of the alumni of the South Carolina College, and his character, as well as his demeanor, was in that institution and in early years, such as it was in subsequent life. His persevering devotion to knowledge was unusual, he was understandingly familiar with his library, and hence, to a sound mind, he added the embellishments of literary cultivation. Though he never employed his intellectual treasures to minister to that poor, but too common vanity, that covets the idle admiration of the multitude, yet they were not unknown to his more intimate associates. Utterly exempt from that equally poor ambition which seeks as an end, popular applause and public station, Berrin's excellencies were somewhat withdrawn from the gaze of the busy world, and his characteristic modesty rendered them rather of a personal and domestic character. Such was the impression which his character made upon the writer, and such was the last remaining son of Judge Joseph Berrin. Long will his memory be hallowed in the tenderest affections of those who knew him best.

THE RAIL ROAD.

The undersigned having been appointed Commissioners, by his Excellency G. McDuffie, to receive subscriptions to the Louisville, Cincinnati and Charleston Rail Road will open the Books for that purpose, on the third Monday in October, at C. Matheson's store in Camden, where it is desired that every citizen of the District will come forward and subscribe for as many shares as their circumstances will warrant. Each share is $100, on which $5 has to be paid at the time of subscribing, and the balance in installments as the work progresses, which may embrace several years. There are but few so poor as not to take one or more shares, and to pay for it without feeling the want of the money. This is one of those few occasions presenting themselves in the life of man, in which he can consult at the same time the public good, and his own immediate private interest. We believe most confidently, that this stock will be valuable, and that in a mere pecuniary point of view it will pay a high dividend; and we have no hesitation in saying that we know, that it will be of the greatest possible benefit to the State, and the United States. It will bind together the South and West in bond of iron, connecting them at the same time by the golden chain of common interest and kindred sympathies. It is an undertaking worthy of the best wishes and most zealous support of every Patriot. South Carolina has now the longest line of Rail Road in the world. If this great work is accomplished, she may long be permitted this proud boast, no other may ever be made to equal it. It is in the compass of our means to pay our portion of the charges—and if we are true, either to our honor, duty or interest, we will do it. If it should fail, let us and our children be able to say that the fault was not with us.

W. M'WILLIE,
C. MATHESON,
W. E. JOHNSON,
Commissioners.
